

There are many Americans who could be considered as heroes, but one hero of mine is Todd Beamer because of his bravery on a single day. He was just an ordinary guy until the day of September 11, 2001.

He was a passenger on United Airlines, Flight 93 which had been hijacked by terrorists and was heading toward the Pentagon. He and other passengers quickly talked and decided to attack the terrorists so the plane would crash before coming into contact with the Pentagon. They were almost positive they were going to die anyway so they decided to fight to save the lives of many others.

He must have been terrified when he realized that the plane was being hijacked but instead of panicking he got the others together and came up with a plan. He was a leader.

He must have had a ton of courage to be able to stand up and fight for people he didn't even know. He knew the outcome of his actions would kill him but he did it anyway.

He must have had faith in the people he was with to be able to fight against his hijackers. He had to have faith in his loved ones that they would be okay to go on without him.

His last words were "Are you guys ready? Let's Roll!" This has become a motto for many people who are willing to fight for what they believe.
